To examine the effects of oxandrolone administration on ovarian function during gonadotropin stimulation in women with polycystic ovarian syndrome (PCOS). Prospective randomized clinical study. A tertiary care university-affiliated hospital. One hundred fifteen women with PCOS and 17 women with normal ovaries. Patients were treated with either 10 mg of transdermal oxandrolone patches or transdermal placebo patches twice daily for 28 days. Ovulation was induced with gonadotropins, and subsequent in vitro fertilization-embryo transfer was performed. Main outcome measures included changes in anti-Müllerian hormone, inhibin B, and estradiol concentrations during gonadotropin stimulation, and achievement of pregnancy. Anti-Müllerian hormone and inhibin B concentrations were significantly lower in women with PCOS than in those with normal ovaries before gonadotropin stimulation. Oxandrolone treatment did not affect the concentrations of anti-Müllerian hormone or inhibin B at any time point. Estradiol concentrations were significantly lower at the end of the second gonadotropin stimulation in women with PCOS, but were similar in both treatment groups. Peak serum concentrations of estradiol in the follicular phase and estradiol during a GnRH agonist flare after human chorionic gonadotropin administration did not differ between treatment groups, and pregnancy rates did not differ in the two treatment groups. Oxandrolone was equally effective in improving anovulatory PCOS-associated ovarian dysfunction. Women with PCOS have premature ovarian aging as well as a partial gonad 09e8f5149f
