If you're a P45 user, you're actually in a better position, because cross processing can directly be used on the P45 raw file in the default module. Albeit, you'll get a warning message for the default setting of 0%, but P45 files can be processed for up to 20.5% or, if you know what the exposure is, the black point of the sensor. Also, Adobe has continued to offer new features from the last release based on suggestions from testing done by users. Here are just some of them:

- Dual-key shortcuts in the keyboard shortcuts panel make it easier to toggle between styles and other actions for working with those styles.
- There is now a "properties panel" in the preferences where you can check items and properties that affect that item or its group.

Another new feature is a built-in, or the first of its kind, smart tool that Adobe calls Smart Fix. Smart Fix will automatically scale images in the layers panel to make it easier to see the detail, and apply basic sharpening and noise reduction. The process is automatic since there is no preview of the results. Since the changes are "fuzzy," you will be asked if it is OK to apply the changes and resave the PSD. The new Lightroom 5 even lets you make changes to import settings such as crop or lens settings when you import. This is useful to avoid mistakes that may have been made when importing. Lightroom also lets you open images heftily resized and set them at unlimited sizes. It's great to see more changes than just adding new features to existing products. It's something that has been missing in software releases since Lightroom's fourth major update. Rather than just adding mere new features, Adobe now focuses on adding deeper capabilities and new capabilities together with existing features. This may turn out to be a mistake, but I feel the company will come out of this period of transition with even more innovative products. Not just for designing, but also for authoring and creation.

There is a basic distinction between the way the browser and the Lightroom application work when it comes to many of the creative files that you can create and edit. While Photoshop is usually used when working with images, Lightroom is used more often when working with video files and photos that you want to generate into a variety of image sizes. That's not to say that you can't work with either of the software, just that they do work differently and handle their files in different ways. You can do more with an image in Photoshop than Lightroom makes it easy to do. For example, you can change the color space of your image to one of the many color spaces that Photoshop offers. You can also add layers, masks, filters, and adjustments to your photos. The new 'Recent Files' view in Photoshop will help you keep track of all the edits you've made. All your files will be listed in a grid, and a quick glance will tell you exactly what you've worked on. Take a look at how Photoshop's Camera RAW editor is different than Lightroom when it comes to editing images you've taken on your phone. It works the same way on the desktop, just a more intuitive workflow. There are more than 72 brand-new functions and tools to help you create powerful works of art.
