These are meant for organizing human genetic data, and they fit right into what I already know about GIS. == A Quick Look at GIS There are a lot of people who have used GIS to organize data (a particular strength of GIS is that it's really a way of organizing and manipulating spatial data). In the past, I've seen GIS used for numerous things, including: * Vote maps - In Florida, for example, they use a version of GIS to make state-level maps showing which areas have voted for which candidate. It's so clear you can see the light being on and off in some areas. * Flood maps - GIS is often used to make flood maps (maps showing the levels of water in rivers). * Land cover maps - GIS is used to make land-cover maps (maps that show which areas are covered by various land cover types). * Hazardous waste maps - GIS is f988f36e3a
