The 2017 mayoral candidate has a unique perspective on the debate over the last of the four planned phases of the $2.6-billion transit project. He's worked as a project manager for decades and retired two years ago, so he's been able to watch the redevelopment around the B-line's planned terminus in the city's West End from both the inside and the outside. He says many residents of the area were skeptical about the idea of taking down a stretch of single-family homes to accommodate a transit station, but they've come to see the benefits of such a scheme in practice. "Back then it was really low-density," he says. "There was a lot of single-family residential. Now, it's a lot denser." Now Bercuson says it's only a matter of time before the West End becomes the next urban hub for the city. "It's the future. It's not the past."
